CHOSEN REFERENCES

"Design in the Age of Digital Reproduction" (1994) William Owen

- * How I would approach interactivity
- * Hypertexts & active language

--> Method - patch writing concept - M.Q.L

- * Interesting approach on breaking text
- * Deconstruct icons

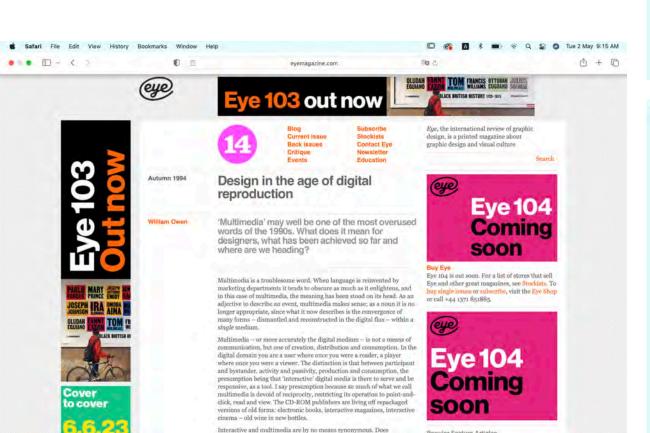

--> iterating initial interventions

FIRST ITERATIONS

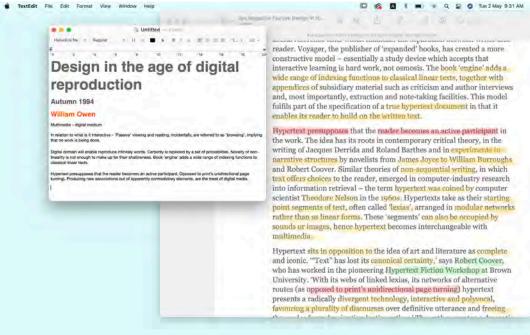

Translate the reference into a new medium (PDF preview) patchwriting: traced my own journey of key ideas

4

Circulate this new version in a different medium (Text Editor)

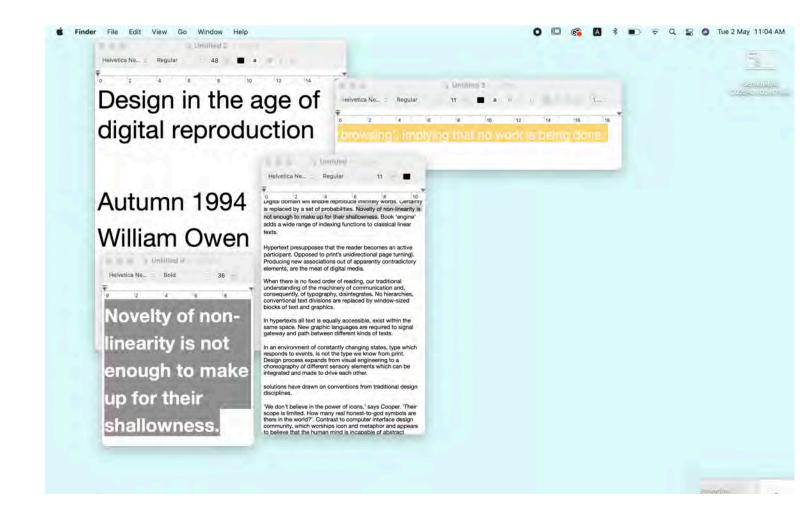

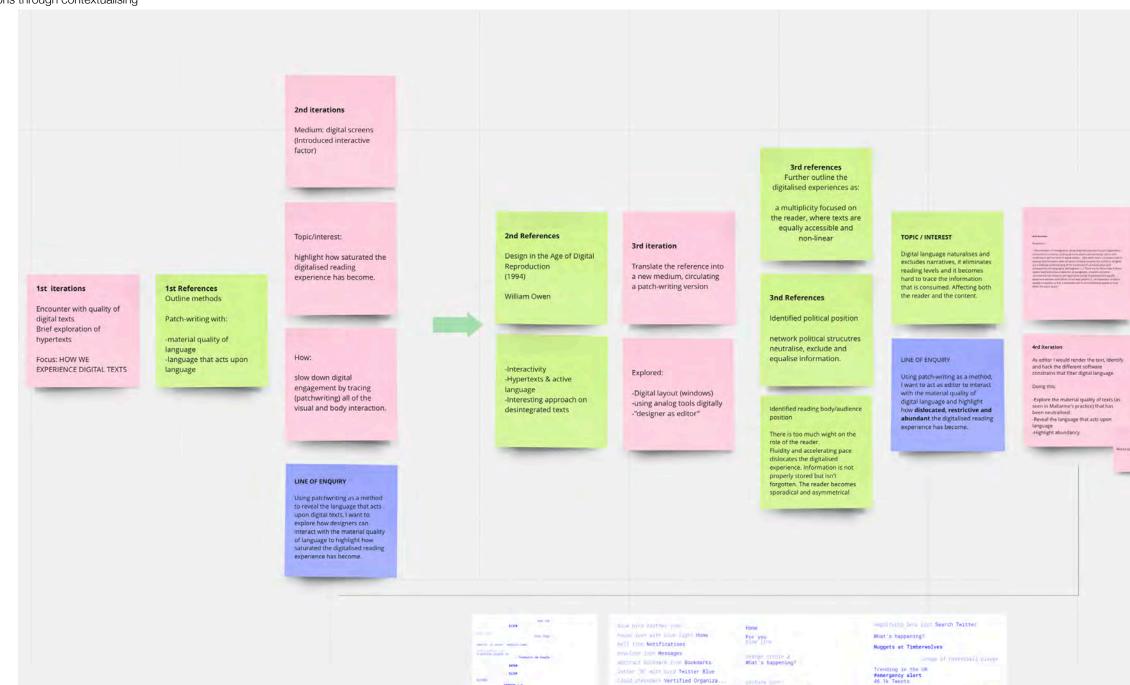

FIRST ITERATIONS - desktop cinema

FIRST ITERATIONS - desktop cinema

- -Explored Digitial Layouts
- -Mixed physicial tools (highlighting) with digital flexibility (M.Q)
- -Designer as editor

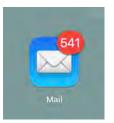

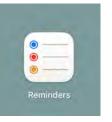

letter B' with Bird Twitter Blue =2000 checkmark Vertified Organiza.

unit 02 - positions through contextualising

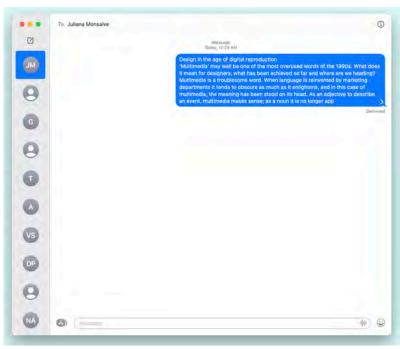

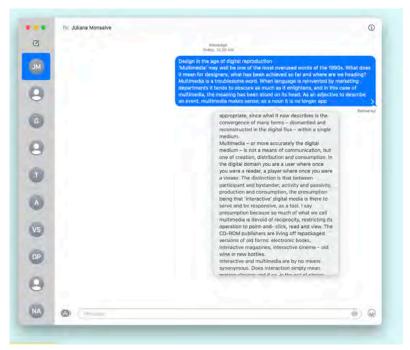

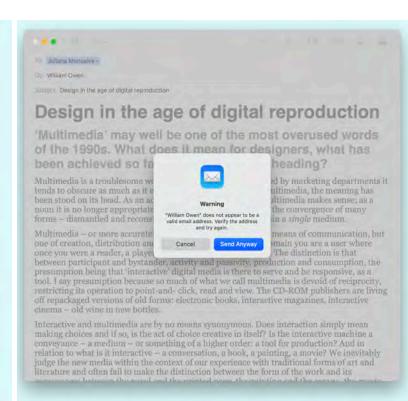

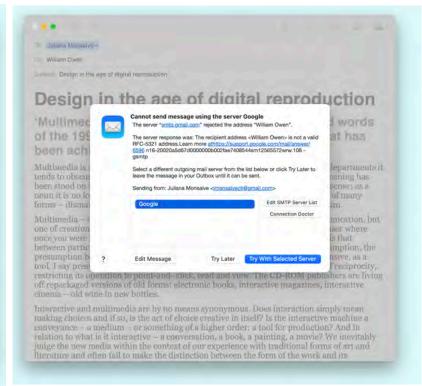

Imessage

- -Not responsive: ignored text hierarchies
- -Cut off
- -Text limit but pop up tabs

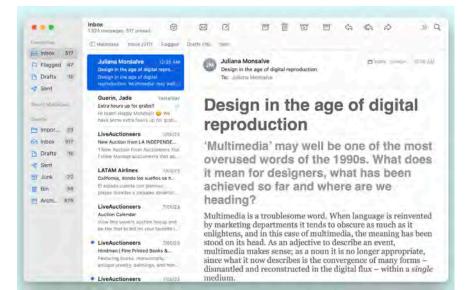

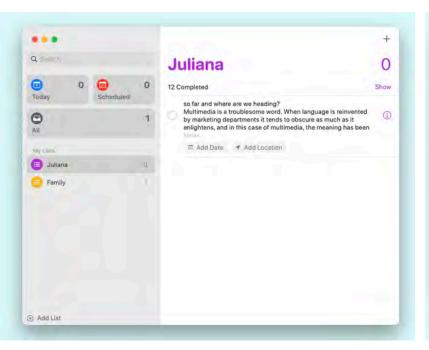

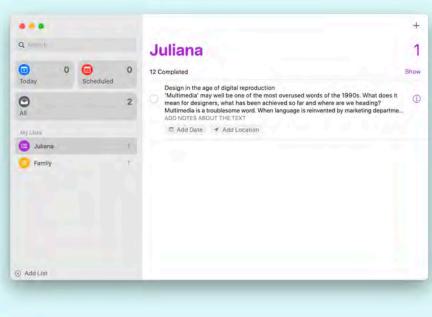

- -Responsive to text structure, hierarchies and typography
- -Maleable within the system
- -Requieres specific language to be circulated

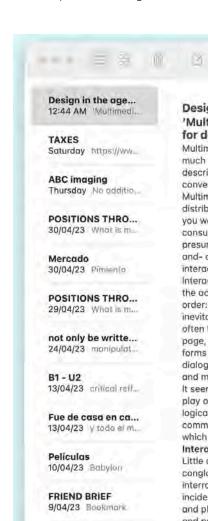

Reminders

- -Not responsive: ignored text hierarchies
- -Arbitrary cut of the text
- -Doesn't scroll, tap vision, it doesn't have a full display of the information. Physical contrains with text

TRABAJOS

7/04/23 L'orieal

JAYON'S Q ...

PUBLICATION WO ...

5/04/23 Xerox machi_

9 May 2023, 12:44 AM Design in the age of digital reproduction

AU (2) III

'Multimedia' may well be one of the most overused words of the 1990s. What does it mean for designers, what has been achieved so far and where are we heading?

A. G. A O O

Multimedia is a troublesome word. When language is reinvented by marketing departments it tends to obscure as much as it enlightens, and in this case of multimedia, the meaning has been stood on its head. As an adjective to describe an event, multimedia makes sense; as a noun it is no longer appropriate, since what it now describes is the convergence of many forms – dismantled and reconstructed in the digital flux – within a single medium. Multimedia – or more accurately the digital medium – is not a means of communication, but one of creation, distribution and consumption. In the digital domain you are a user where once you were a reader, a player where once you were a viewer. The distinction is that between participant and bystander, activity and passivity, production and consumption, the presumption being that 'interactive' digital media is there to serve and be responsive, as a tool. I say presumption because so much of what we call multimedia is devoid of reciprocity, restricting its operation to point–and–click, read and view. The CD-ROM publishers are living off repackaged versions of old forms: electronic books, interactive magazines, interactive cinema – old wine in new bottles.

Interactive and multimedia are by no means synonymous. Does interaction simply mean making choices and if so, is the act of choice creative in itself? Is the interactive machine a conveyance – a medium – or something of a higher order: a tool for production? And in relation to what is it interactive – a conversation, a book, a painting, a movie? We inevitably judge the new media within the context of our experience with traditional forms of art and literature and often fail to make the distinction between the form of the work and its conveyance: between the novel and the printed page, the painting and the canvas, the movie and celluloid. Clearly the conveyance is dumb, but the notion that these forms involve no dialogue between artist and viewer and that the act of consumption is passive is false. In fact, the dialogue is simply indirect; it takes place through a process of public and private discussion, works of critical theory and media attention.

It seems, then, that there is a rising scale of interactivity from viewing and reading at one end, through interrogation, play or exploration, to composition and construction. Digital media can take any form expressible in numerical or logical terms and conceivable by the human imagination: viewer, finder, player, simulator, composer, recorder, copier, communicator. The medium has no fixed formal quality of its own and is only definable as a broad electronic domain in which new genres, species and sub-species of art will emerge to add to traditional means of expression.

Interactivity is hard work

Little of this is apparent from the way digital media is marketed by the computer software and print media conglomerates, which to date have gone no further than the lower orders of interactivity: viewing, reading, play and interrogation, all of which are compatible with the notion of a leisure market. 'Passive' viewing and reading, incidentally, are referred to as 'browsing', implying that no work is being done. This confusing distinction between work and play is repeated in the way the computer industry categorises its products: those oriented to control, calculation and production are known as operating system, utility, tool, and application; those oriented towards play are almost all called games. But because interactive digital media collapses consumption and production, such distinctions become meaningless. Attempts to clear the confusion have resulted in clumsy neologisms such as 'edutainment' and the risible 'content-based software'. Otherwise the distinction remains, and it is dulling the ambition of software developers. Cultural inhibition is only one of many obstacles preventing new media products from realising their potential, but it will probably be the most difficult to overcome. What Roland Barthes called 'the pitiless divorce which the literary institution maintains between the producer of the text and its user, between its owner and its customer, between its author and its reader' is deeply rooted in our social fabric and not something which can be cured by the application of mere technology. For some years now it has been apparent that the digital domain will enable its occupiers to create

Notes

- -Responsive to strucutre but renders herarquies and type
- -Narrow posibilities in modifing text style

Design in the age of digital reproduction

'Multimedia' may well be one of the most overused words of the 1990s. What does it mean for designers, what has been achieved so far and where

Design in the age of digital reproduction

'Multimedia' may well be one of the most overused words of the 1990s. What does it mean for designers, what has been achieved so far and where are we heading?

Multimedia is a troublesome word. When language is reinvented by marketing departments it tends to obscure as much as it enlightens, and in this case of multimedia, the meaning has been stood on its head. As an adjective to describe an event, multimedia makes sense; as a noun it is no longer appropriate, since what it now describes is the convergence of many forms – dismantled and reconstructed in the digital flux – within a single medium.

Multimedia – or more accurately the digital medium – is not a means of communication, but one of creation, distribution and consumption. In the digital domain you are a user where once you were a reader, a player where once you were a viewer. The distinction is that between participant and bystander, activity and passivity, production and consumption, the presumption being that 'interactive' digital media is there to serve and be responsive, as a tool. I say presumption because so much of what we call multimedia is devoid of reciprocity, restricting its operation to point-and-click, read and view. The CD-ROM publishers are living off repackaged versions of old forms: electronic books, interactive magazines, interactive cinema – old wine in new bottles.

Interactive and multimedia are by no means synonymous. Does interaction simply mean making choices and if so, is the act of choice creative in itself? Is the interactive machine a conveyance — a medium — or something of a higher order: a tool for production? And in relation to what is it interactive — a conversation, a book, a painting, a movie? We inevitably judge the new media within the context of our experience with traditional forms of art and literature and often fail to make the distinction between the form of the work and its conveyance: between the novel and the printed page, the painting and the canvas, the movie and celluloid. Clearly the conveyance is dumb, but the notion that these forms involve no dialogue between artist and viewer and that the act of consumption is passive is false. In fact, the dialogue is simply indirect; it takes place through a process of public and private discussion, works of critical theory and media attention.

It seems, then, that there is a rising scale of interactivity from viewing and reading at one end, through interrogation, play or exploration, to composition and construction. Digital media can take any form expressible in numerical or logical terms and conceivable by the human imagination; viewer, finder, player, simulator, composer, recorder, copier, communicator. The medium has no fixed formal quality of its own and is only definable as a broad electronic domain in which new genres, species and sub-species of art will emerge to add to traditional means of expression.

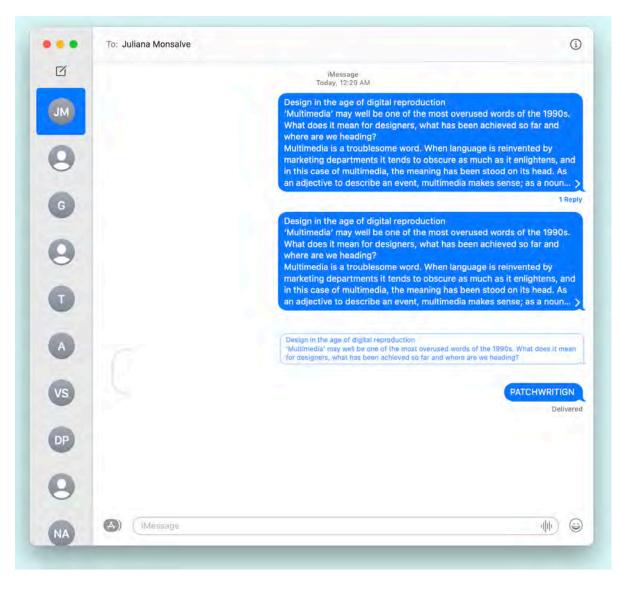

Interactivity is hard work

Little of this is apparent from the way digital media is marketed by the computer software and print media conglomerates, which to date have gone no further than the lower orders of interactivity; viewing, reading, play and interrogation, all of which are compatible with the notion of a leisure market. Passive' viewing and reading, incidentally, are referred to as 'browsing', implying that no work is being done. This confusing distinction between work and play is repeated in the way the computer industry categorises its products: those oriented to control, calculation and production are known as operating system, utility, tool, and application; those oriented towards play are almost all called games. But because interactive digital media collapses consumption and production, such distinctions become meaningless. Attempts to clear the confusion have resulted in clumsy neologisms such as 'edutainment' and the risible 'content-based software'. Otherwise the distinction remains, and it is dulling the ambition of software developers.

Cultural inhibition is only one of many obstacles preventing new media products from realising their potential, but it will probably be the most difficult to overco
Roland Barthes called 'the pitiless divorce which the literary institution maintains between the producer of the text and its user, between its owner and its custon between its author and its reader' is deeply rooted in our social fabric and not something which can be cured by the application of mere technology. For some yea has been apparent that the digital domain will enable its occupiers to create and compose free of material and physical constraints; to communicate and any impact of the production of th

Stickie note

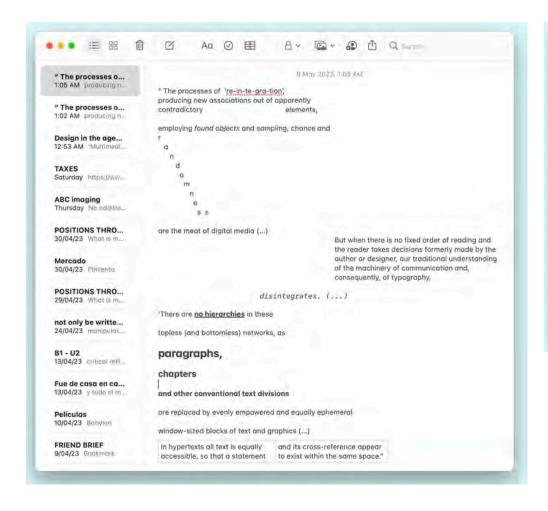

- -Responsive to text structure, hierarchies and typography
- -Responsive to system (windows)
- -Multiple posibilities in modifing text style

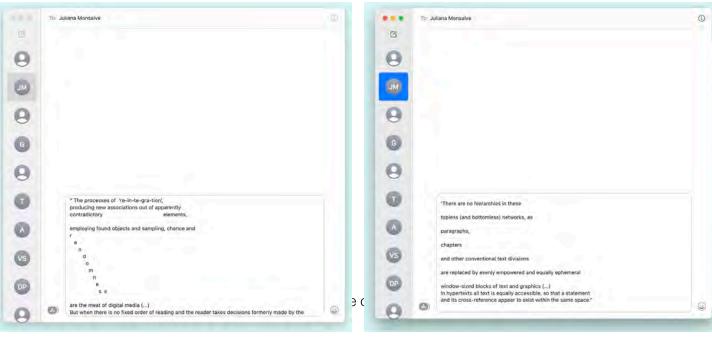

After first approach --- see other options in system

Possibilities

- -Responde to messages as an exercise of hyperlinking and responde to parts of text
- -It depends on other softwares to have structure (enter/returen)

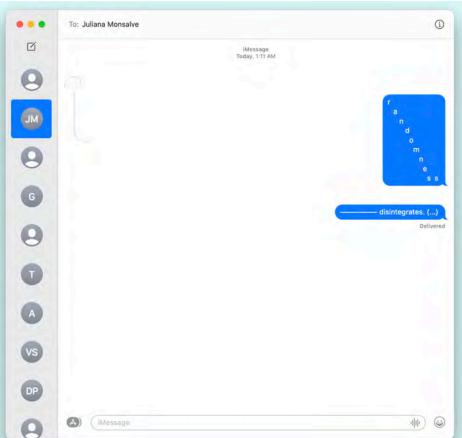

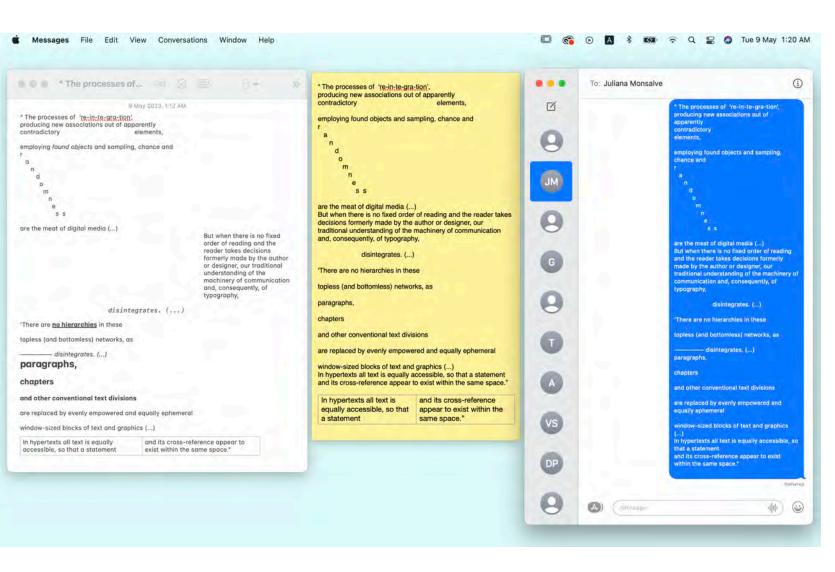

Notes as an aid

Tried different layouts to see if imessage would turn maintain them magnifying lens icon search Twitter blue bird twitter icon house icon with blue light Home bell icon Notifications orange circle J What's happening? Nuggets at Timberwolves envelope icon Messages image of basketball player abstract bookmark icon Bookmarks Trending in the UK Wemergency alert letter "B" with bird Twitter Blue round edge square GIF cloud checkmark vertified Organiza. human icon Profile smilev face envelope icon More Trending with #TimelessCo blue oval Tweet Trending in the UK john barns three dots CLICK round edge square Everyone down arr three dots COMMAND + V orange circle J Black oval chart data red highlight Circle picture Dom Kelly three dots -137 plus sign Black oval chart data

Iteration pause

- -Focusing too much on material quality, limitation and posibilitis between apps
- -Equalising the language and info, by removing it from initial website/PDF and rendeidnrgin in the apple system.
- -When reveal the language that acts upon language I am neutralising
- -Moving away form typing icons and steps because, don't want to focus exclusively on this UX experience

 These are just one part of overall saturated experience

Define an idea:

Where am I taking this further?
What did the first part of iterating
+ references push through?

Digitalise reading experience and navigation puts too much weight on the reader.

-Reduce speed -make visible the qualitative and quantitive characteristics of digitalise reading that puts too much pressure on the reader.

LINE OF ENQUIRY

Using patch-writing as a method, I want to reveal the language that acts upon digital language to reduce the speed of consumption and highlight how dislocated, restrictive and abundant the digitalised reading experience has become.

5rd iteration

- choose one app to explore: Preview
- -edit on with text
- -it is an active PDF, hyperlinks

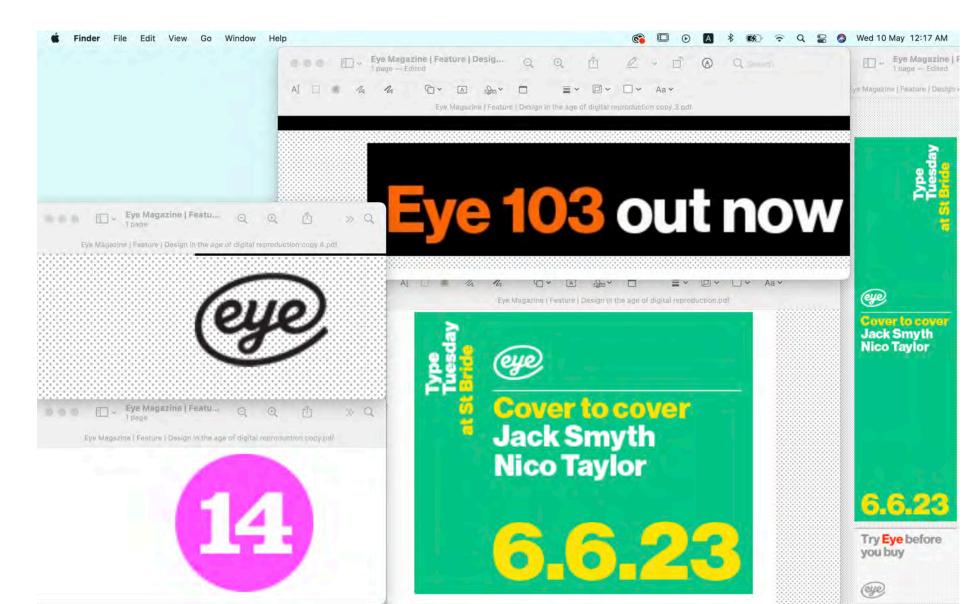

Revel the language that acts upon the O.G info by Lay out all of the visual and language actors of the preview PDF

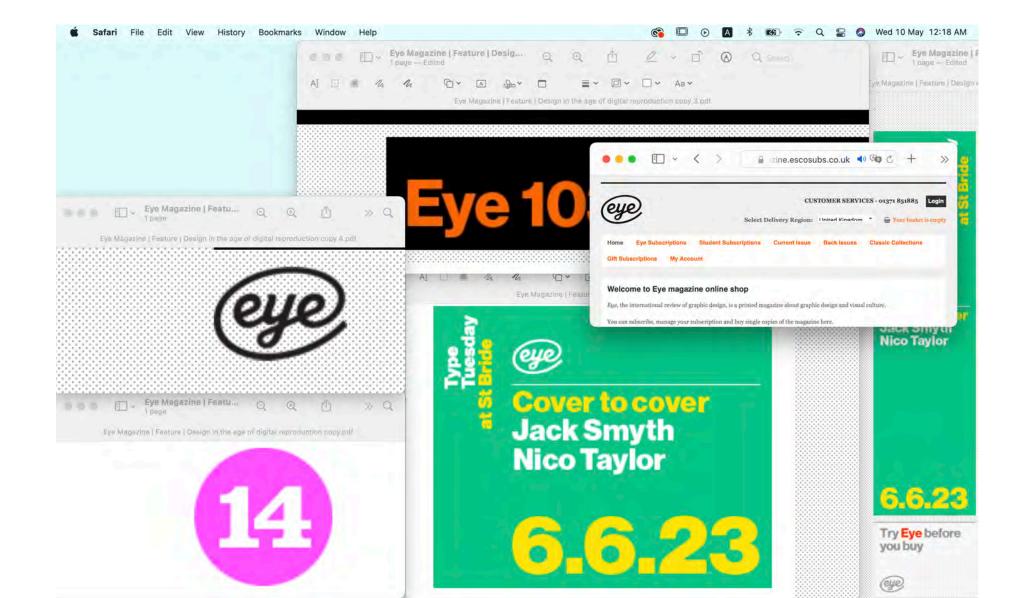

Slow down & make explicit the hypertext

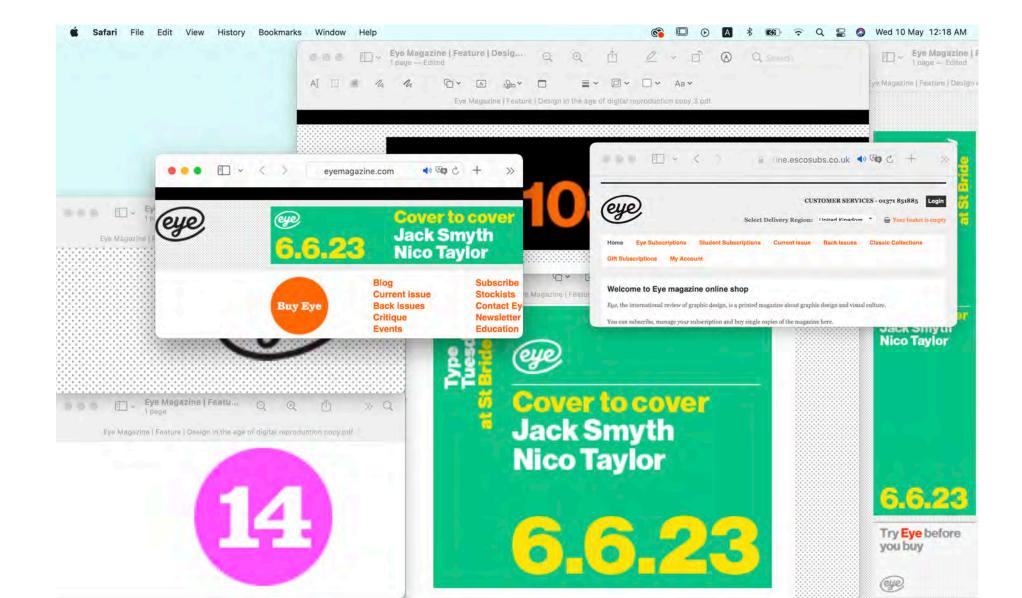

Create a publication of the different narratives of a single text. Publication allows me to display in quantity of hypertext.

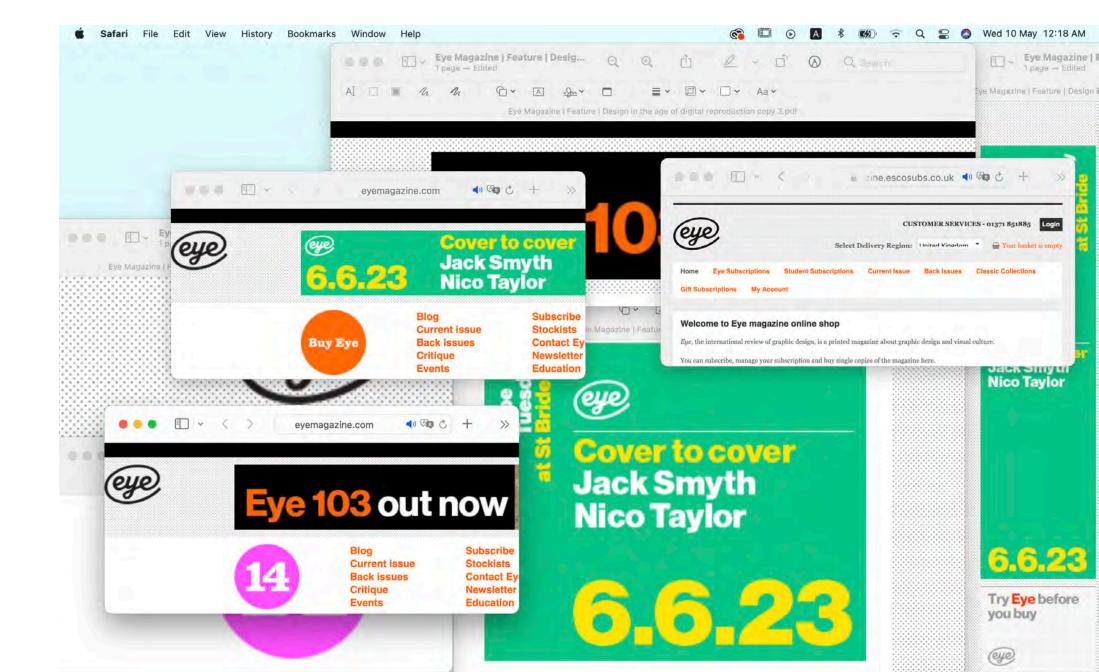

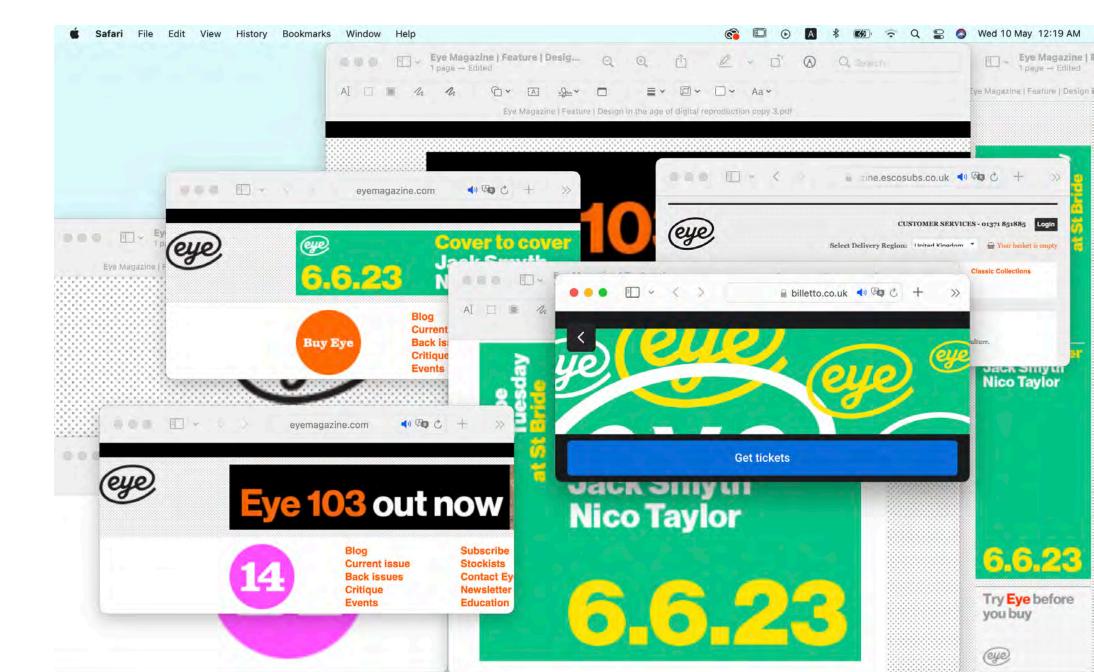

____ ways of hyper {reading} texts

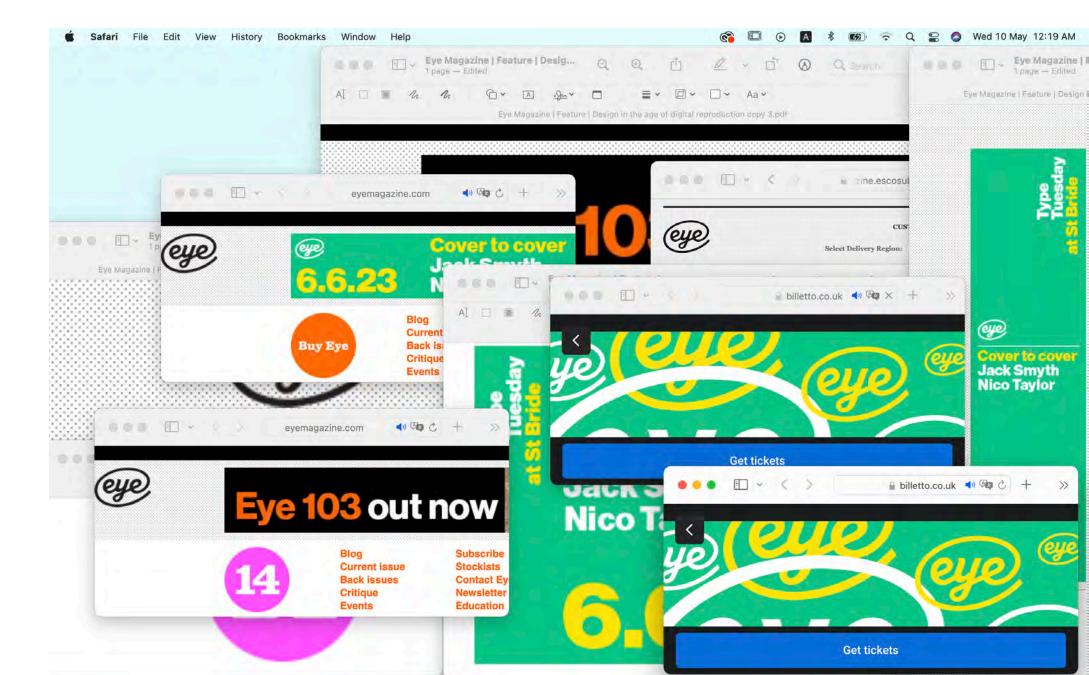

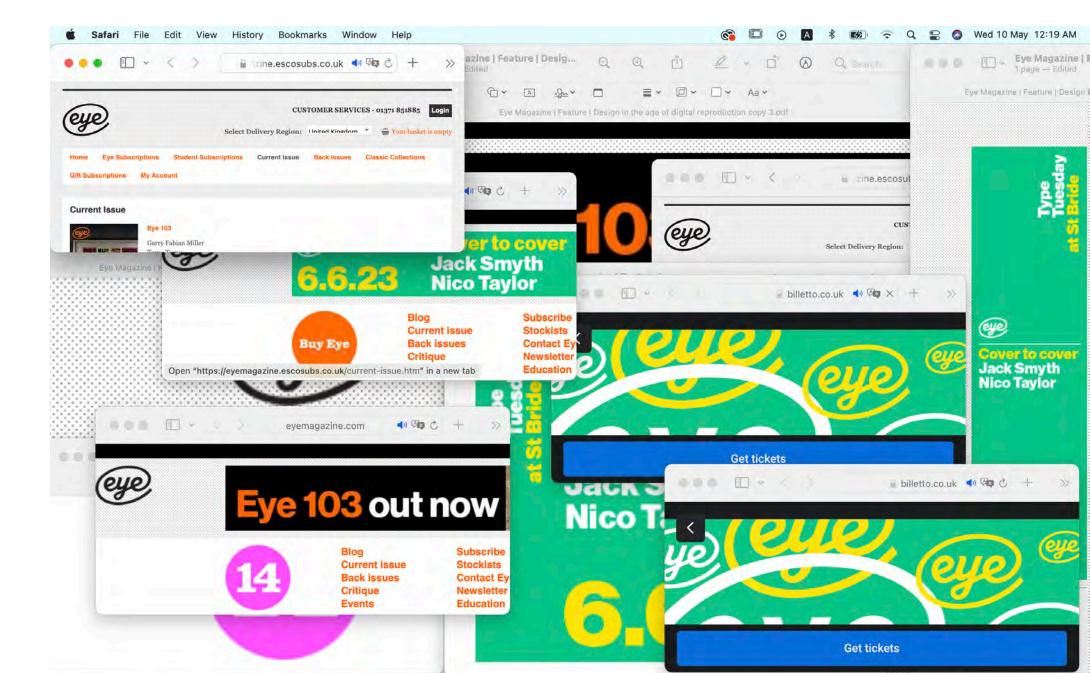

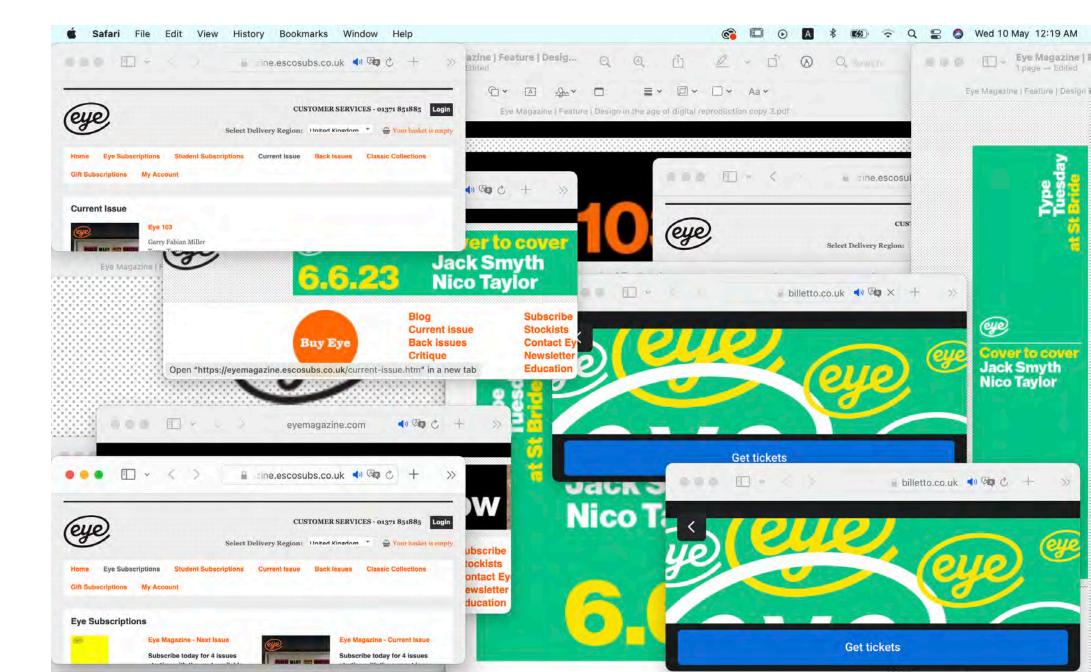

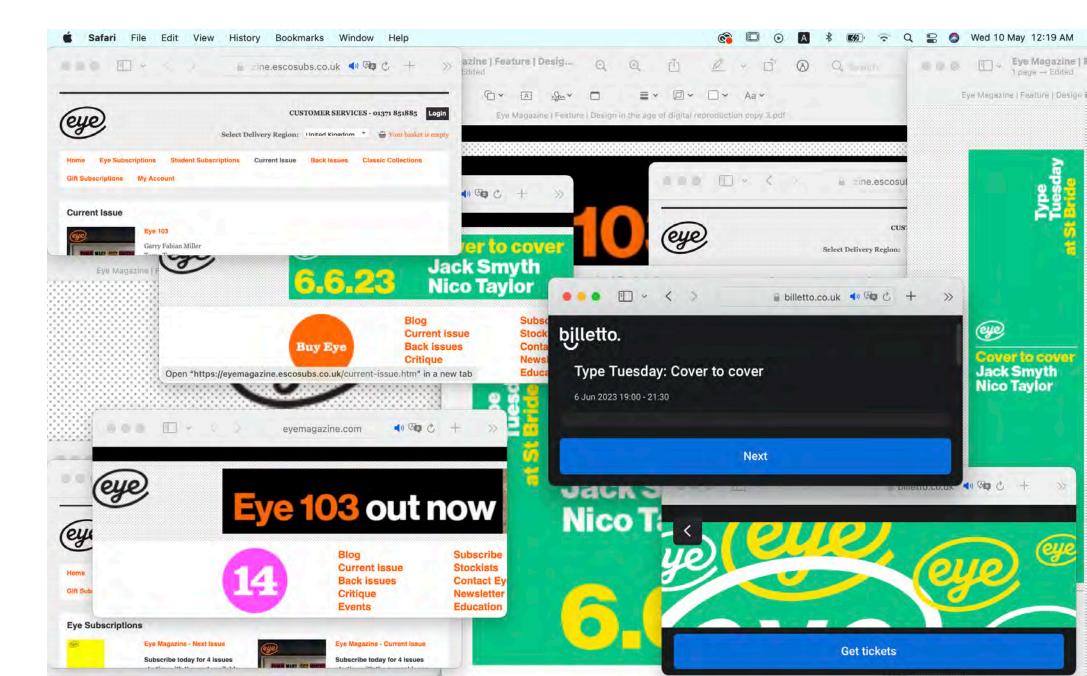

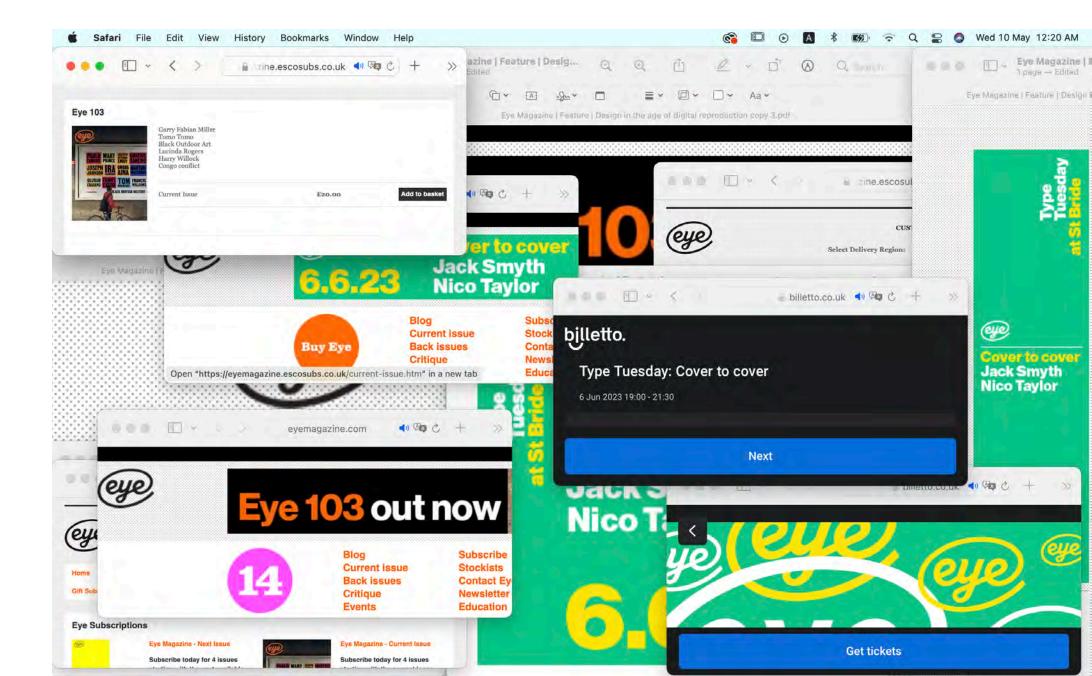

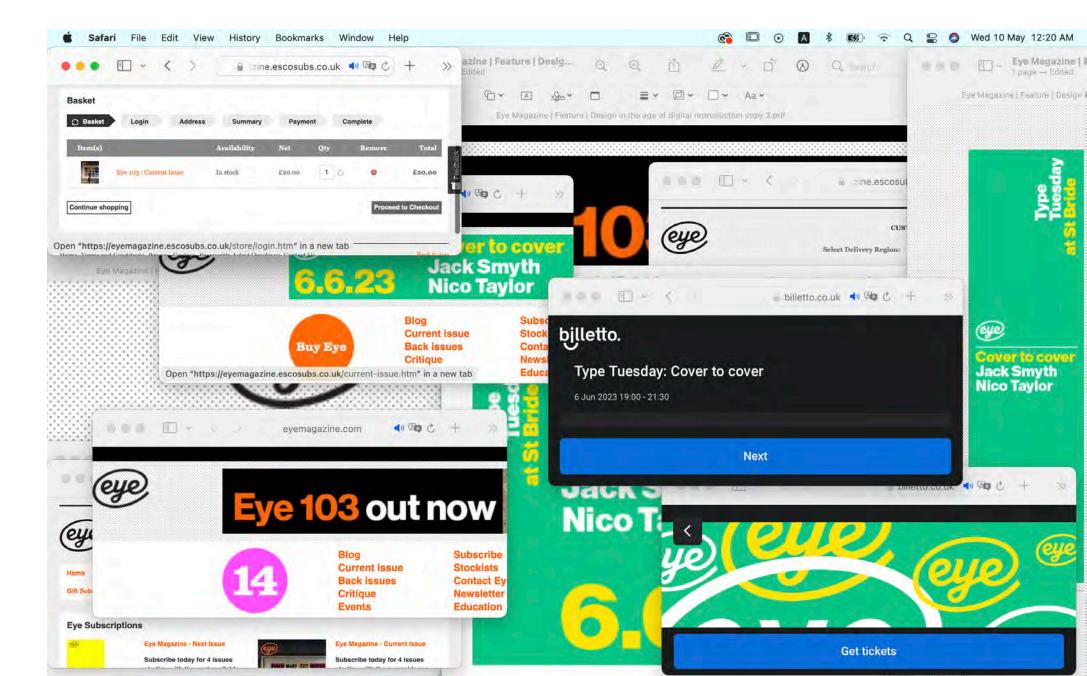

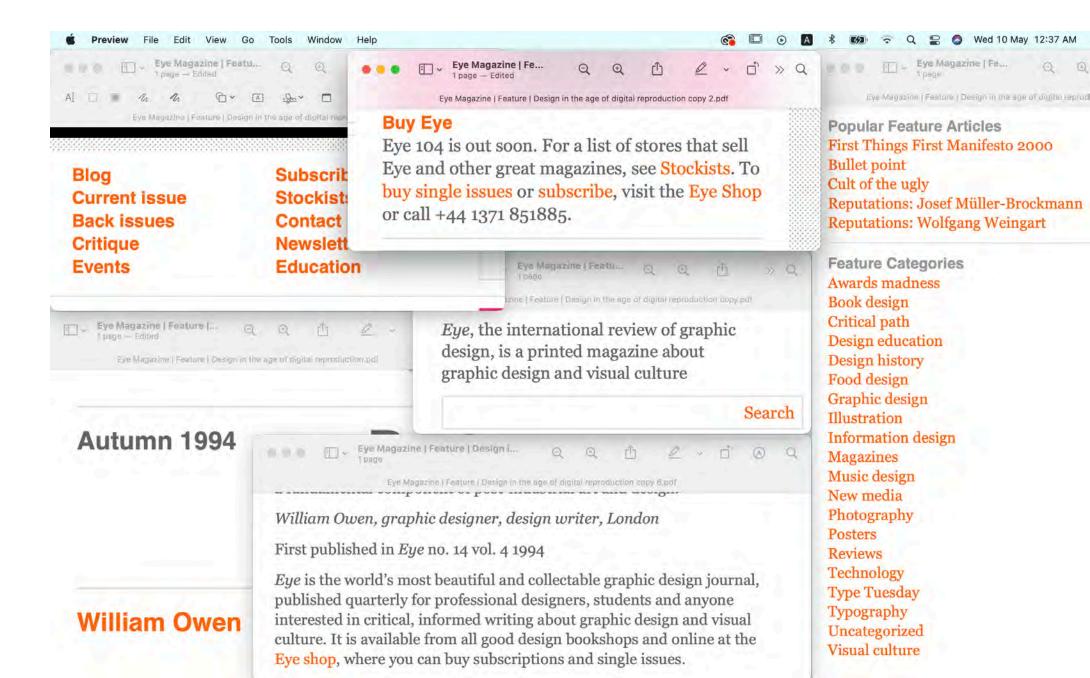

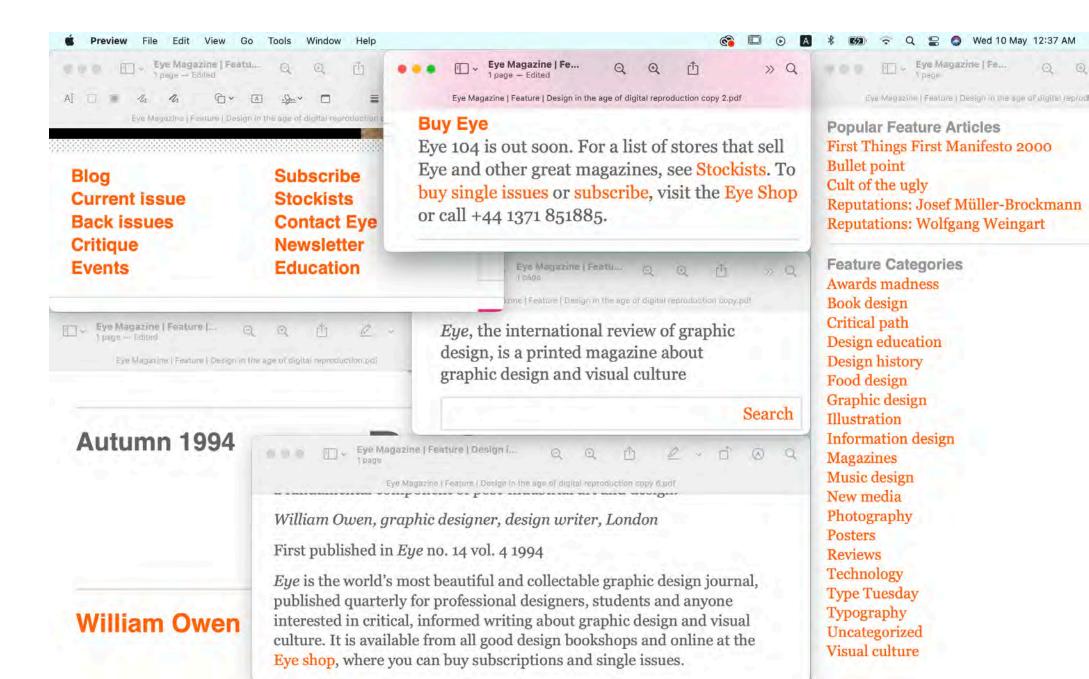

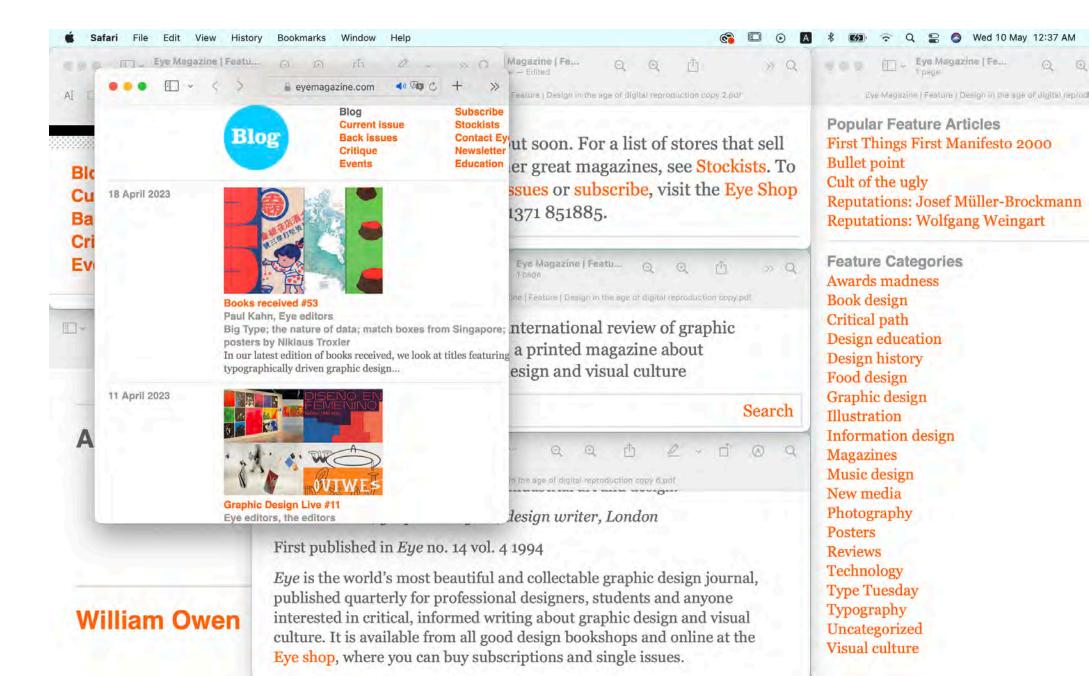

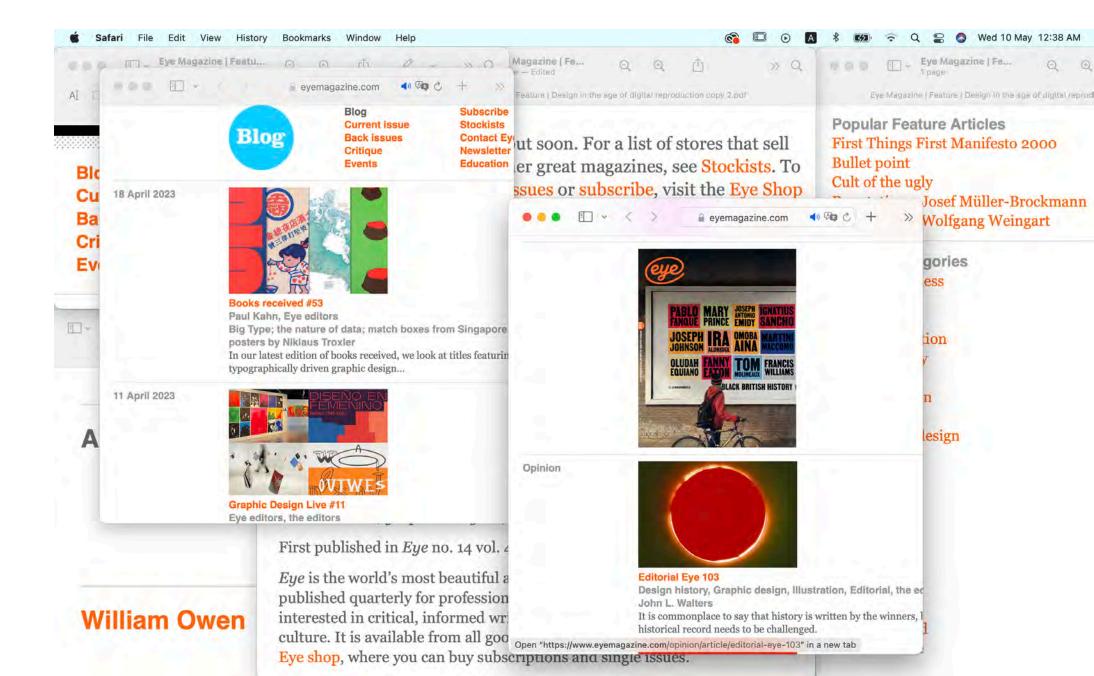

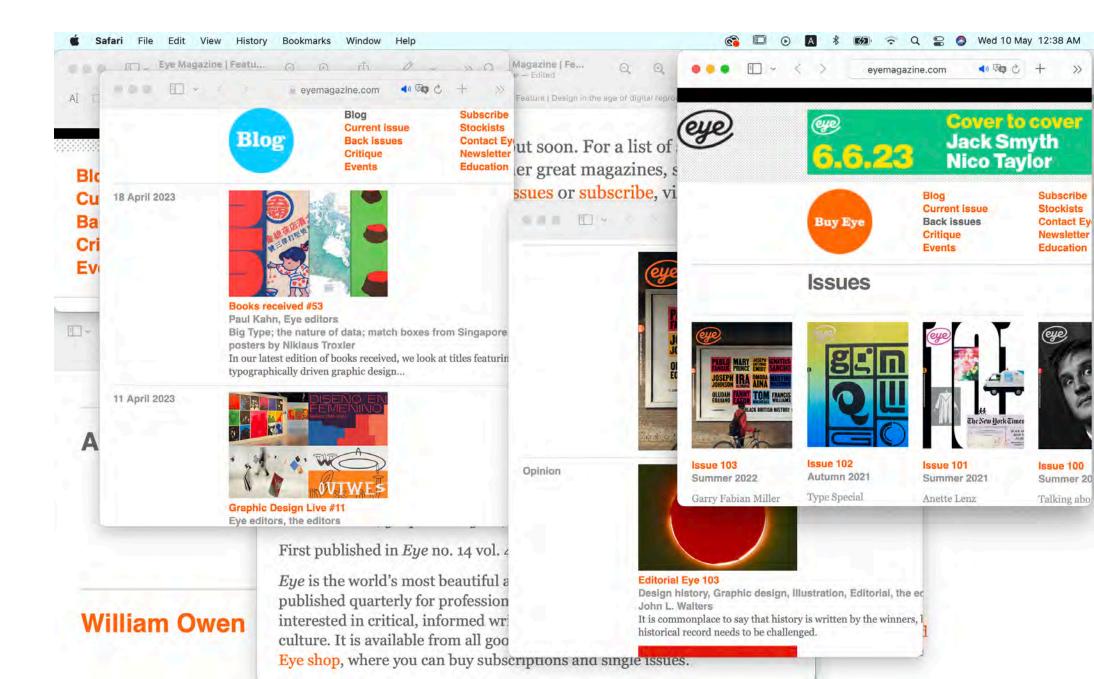

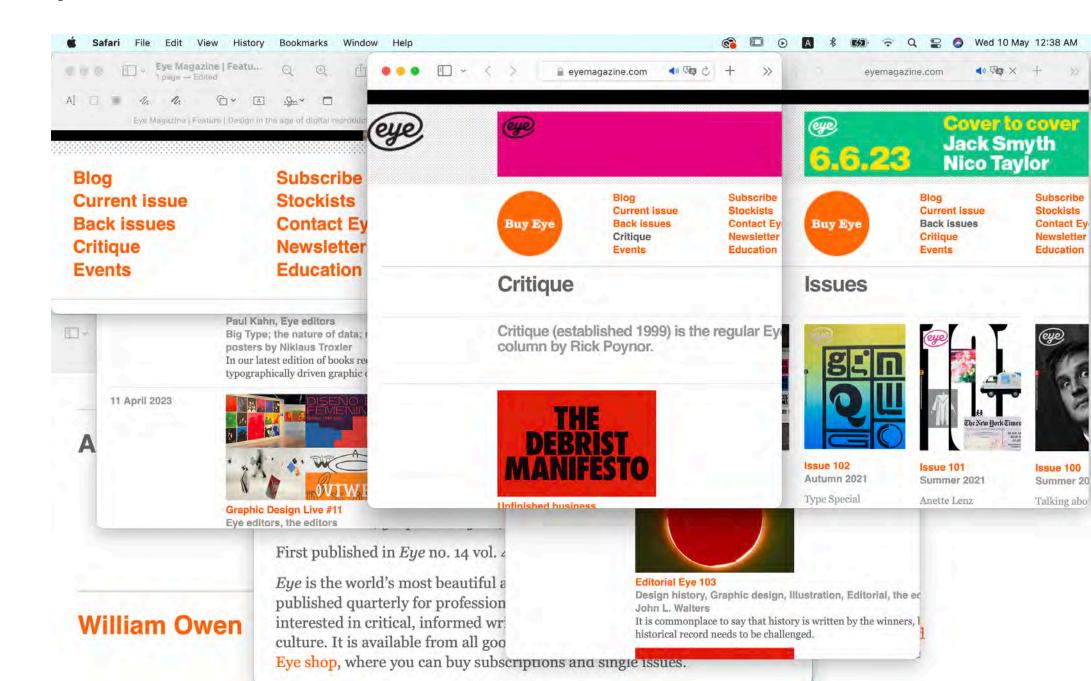

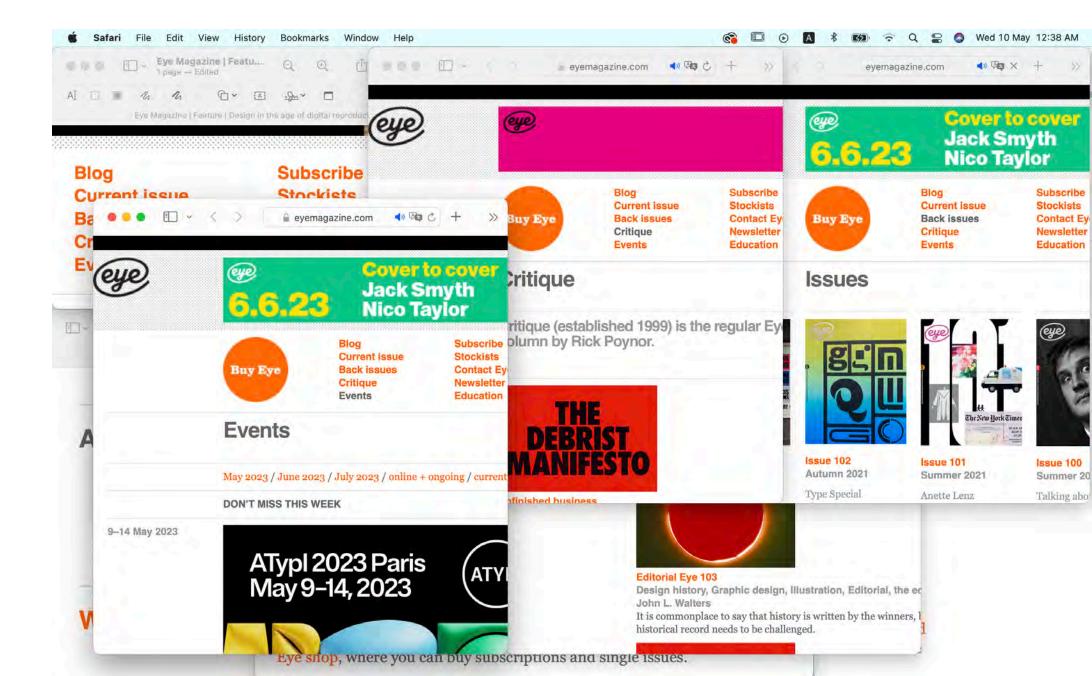

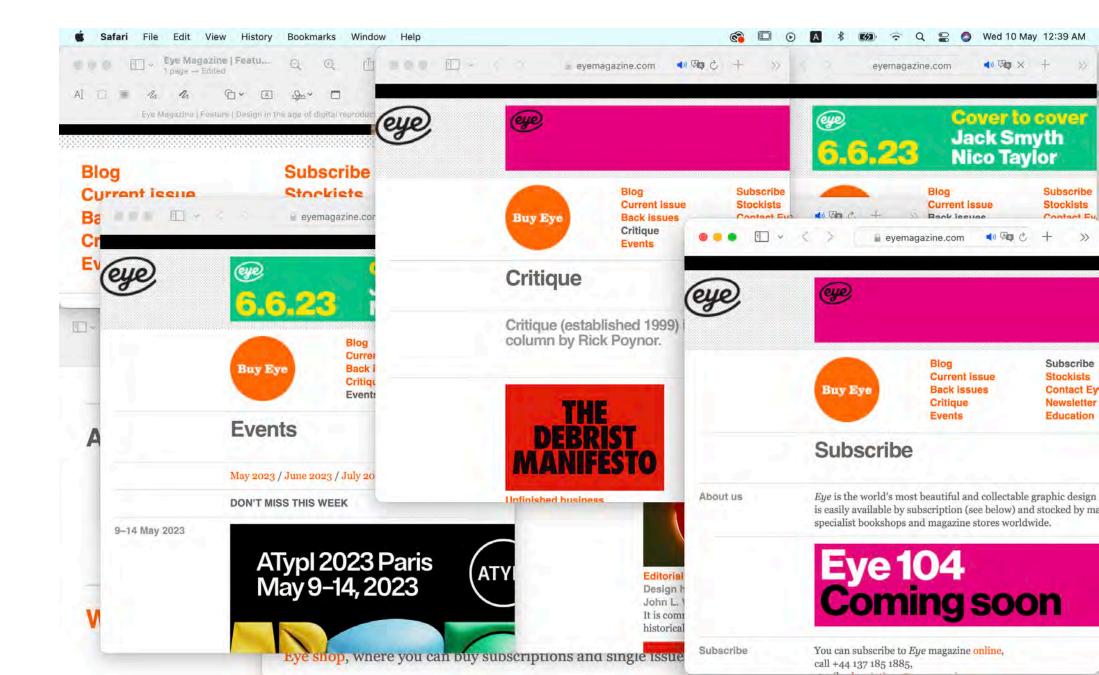

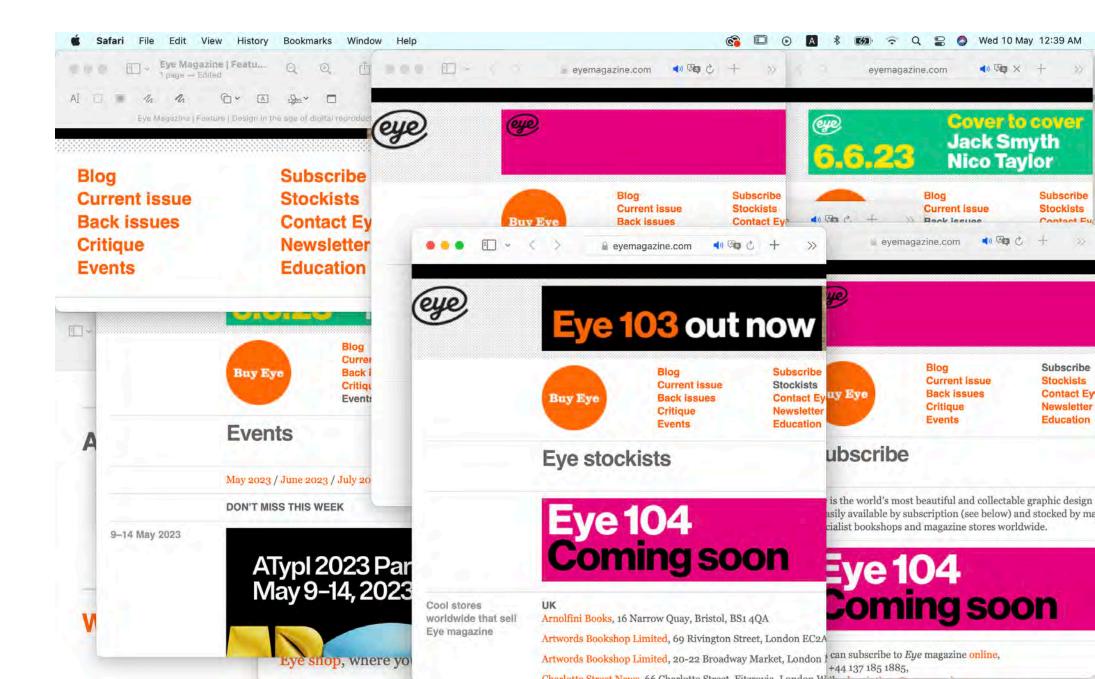

Eye Magazine | Featu...

Eye Magazine | Feature | Design in the age of digital reproduction copy.pdf

Autumn 1994

Eye 103 out now

Subscribe Stockists Contact Eye Newsletter Education Eye, the international review of grap design, is a printed magazine about graphic design and visual culture

Search

Try Eye before you buy

Design in the age of digital reproduction

'Multimedia' may well be one of the most overused words of the 1990s. What does it mean for designers, what has been achieved so far and where are we heading?

Maltimodii is a troublesome word. When language is reinvented by marketing departments it tends to obscure as much as it enlighbest, and in this case of multimodia, the meaning has been stood on its bead, As an adjective to describe an event, multimodis makes sense, as a noun it is no language appropriate, since what it is modescribes in the conveyagement many forms—dissuantled and reconstructed in the digital flux—within a single medium:

Multimedia — or more necessitably the lights meedium—is not a meanand communication, before or circuis distribution and consumptions In the digital domain post are a user where once you were a reader, a player where nearly van even a view where a reader, a player where nearly van even a view. The distinction is that between participant and bystander, activity and passivity, production and consumption, the presumption heigh that fineractive digital media is there to severe and the repossaries, as a tool. I say presumption because so much of what we call multimedia is devoid of recipocity, restricting its operation to point-sud-click, read and wise. The CD-ROM publishers are living off repeakaged versions of Jold forms: electronic books, interactive magazines, interactive cinema — old wise in mose bottles.

Interactive and multimetia are by no means symmymous. Does memerical subply times multipethodes and if on, little six of relation received in the lateractive muchine a conveyance—a medium-creation of which evolves to do for production? And it settled to distribute the lateractive of the lateractive for the lateractive and often fill it makes it.

It inturnates between the form of the week and it is conveyance between the moved and the pointed page, the painting and the curvast, the movie and cellulated. Carly the conveyance is doubt, but the notion that these forms involve no dislogue between artist and viewer and that the set of consumption is passive in false. In cite, the dislogue; as imply insidered, it takes place through a process of public and private discussion, works of critical theory and media alternative.

It seems, then, that there is a rising scale of interactivity from viewing and reading at one end, through interrogation, play or exploration, to composition and construction. Digital media can take any form expressible in numerical or logical terms and conceivable by the human imagination; where, finder, player, simulatin, compositive, recorden, copies of the control of the con

Interactivity is hard work

Little of this is apparent from the way digital media is marketed by the computer software and print media to conglimentace, which to date have gone no further than the lower orders of interactivity; viewing, reading, play and interropation, all of which are compatible with the nution of a leasure market. Plantive viewing and reading, incidentally, are general to a because market. Plantive viewing and reading, incidentally, are general to a framework of the properties of the confusing distinction between such and play is repeated in the way the computer industry categories its products those oriented to control, calculation and production are known as operating system, utility, tool, and application, those oriented forwards play are almost all sailed games. But application, these oriented forwards play are almost all sailed games. But where the control of the confusion, have resulted in clumys no obgiques such as 'dentification' and oriented forwards used as 'dentification' and oriented forwards used as 'dentification' and the 'distilled' content-based softward. Otherwise the distinction remains, and it is dealing the ambition of software developers.

Cultural inhibition is only one of many obtacles preventing new media products from realising their operating, but it will probably be the most difficult to uvercome. What Roland Barthes called the pittless directly which the fitnessy instrustion maintains between the produces of the next and its user, between its owner and its eastmer, between its uither and its reader it deeply rooted in our social their can due something which

Buy Eye Eye ruq is out soon. For a list of stores that sell Eye and other great magazines, see Stockies. To buy single issues or subscribe, visit the Eye Shop or call +44 1371 851885.

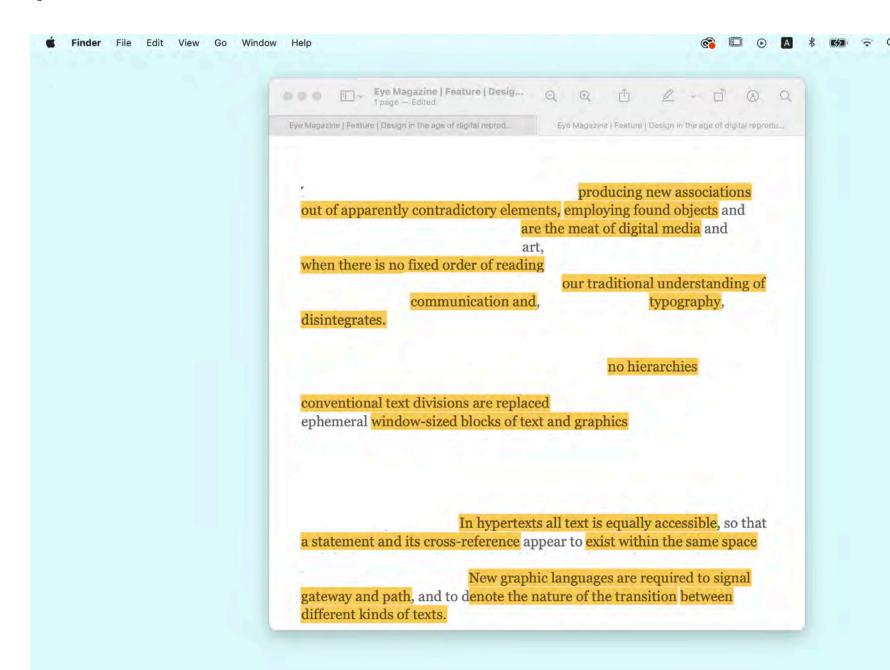

Popular Feature Articles
First Things First Manifesto 2000
Bullet point
Cult of the ugly
Reputations: Josef Muller-Brockmann
Resolutions: Walfesto Weimant

Feature Calegories Awards madema Book design

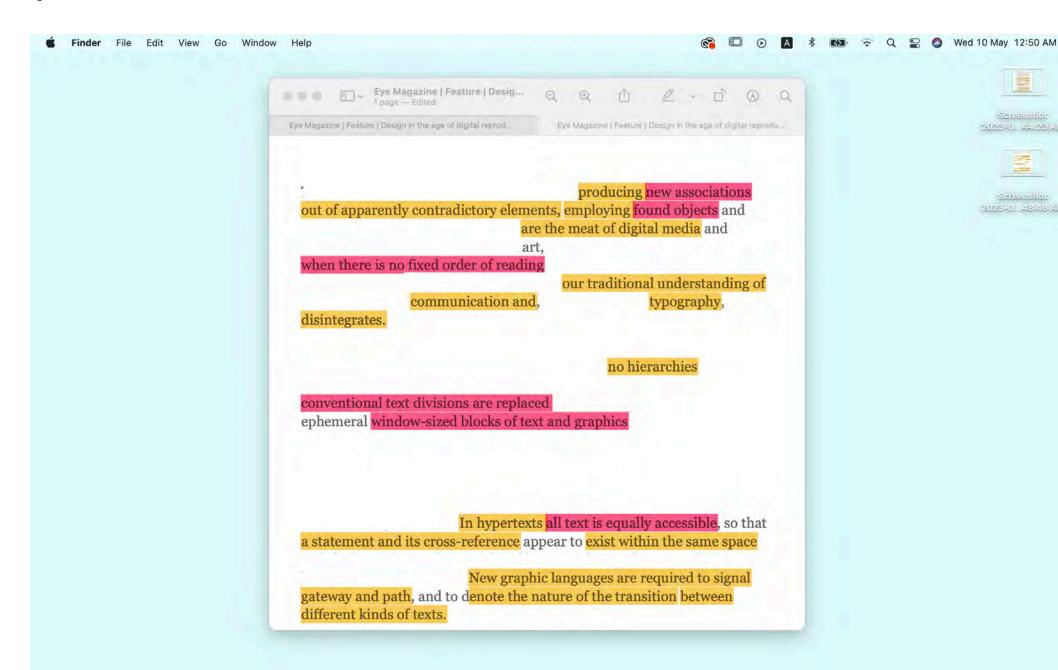

Design education
Design history
Food design
Graphic design
Illustration
Information design
Mugarines
Music design
New media
Photography
Pusturs
Reviewa
Technology
Type Tuesday
Typography

Wed 10 May 12:44 AM

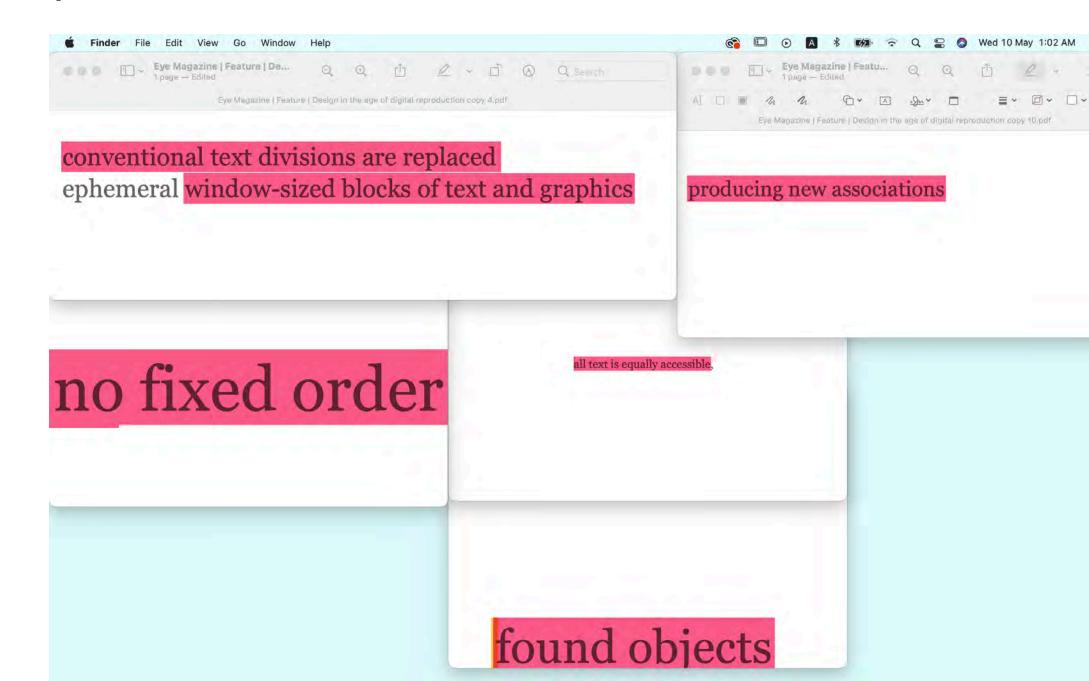

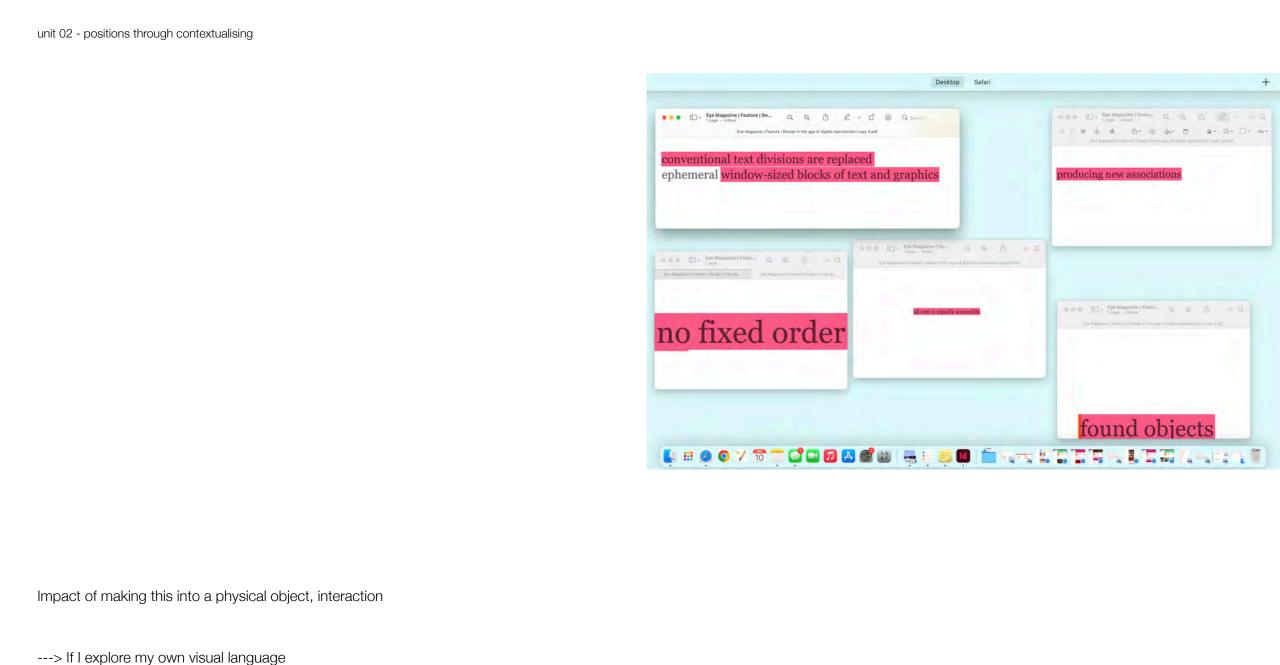

Wed 10 May 12:48 AM

2025-6 44.25 AM

2026-C 44.25 AM

most likely bring everything on the same level field - neutralise/equalise more